Completing a doctoral degree is a humbling process, and at no time is that more clear than when it comes time to acknowledge those who made it possible. An astonishing number of individuals and organizations generously promoted and supported the Mindful Leadership Study: professors, friends, colleagues, and people who contacted me out of the blue because they heard about it and were inspired to help. To all of you: Thank you. I feel a tremendous debt of gratitude, and I hope to “pay it forward.”

Breaking with tradition, I would like to thank my husband, Stephen Brown, first and foremost. None of this would ever have happened without him, literally.

Robert Kegan, my advisor and committee chairperson, has provided me with an intellectual home base since I first took his course in Adult Development eleven years ago while a Masters student. His brilliance as a lecturer and mastery of supportive and straightforward communication are models that I will always aspire to emulate. Along with his other advisees and teaching fellows, I especially want to thank Bob for his generosity sharing his awesome seats at Fenway Park for Red Sox games, at the Garden for Celtics games, as well as indulging our love of great food, especially the quest for the perfect crème brûlée. My second committee member, Jerry Murphy, taught me how to get real in all the best ways while pursuing your dream, and to “never, never, never give up.” His extraordinary ability to “make it stick” as a teacher, to have fun and be serious at the same time, and his unsurpassed commitment to his students transformed my teaching and made my last few years at Harvard truly a joy. Michael Nakkula, my third committee member, shared my passion for bridging theory and practice as developmental psychologists, and held the faith that I could do this at the times when I most doubted it myself. His depth of understanding of the interpretive process and of the potential for mutual transformation through mentoring will forever guide my efforts to teach and help others fulfill their potential in life.

Several other faculty and staff have made vital contributions to this project. Lisa Feldman-Barrett of Boston College served as a reader for my Qualifying Paper, and her research on emotions in part inspired this study. The doctoral program at HGSE provides exceptional training in quantitative data analysis via the inspired teaching, support, and good humor of Terry Tivnan and John Willett. The brilliant and courageous work of Annie g. Rogers brought me to HGSE in the first place. I am indebted to her for teaching me how to listen for the unsaid, and to Carol Gilligan and Wendy Luttrell for introducing me to the joys of qualitative inquiry. I also want to thank Fernando Reimers who provided crucial help revising the dissertation proposal. Joelle Mottola, COD administrator extraordinaire, saved me on many occasions with her professional assistance, sense of humor, and compassion. Jane Calhoun of the Harvard IRB office, and Marcia Brownlee, Jackie Knapke, Amanda Scobie, Piero Buscaglia, and Karen Bottari all helped me successfully navigate life at Harvard. Ruth Baer of the University of Kentucky provided generous assistance with assessing mindfulness. Stephen Brown helped me learn SYSTAT and the graphic display features of Excel, and discussed statistical analyses and findings from the study.

I owe special debts of gratitude to Anne Harrington, Professor of the History of Science at Harvard University, and Richard Gombrich, retired Boden Professor of Sanskrit at the University of Oxford and Founder-President of the Oxford Centre for Buddhist Studies. Anne introduced me to the study of the mind during my first year as a doctoral student. The breadth of my interdisciplinary interests was directly inspired and shaped by her commanding grasp of mind-body issues, and her mentoring and confidence in me has provided deeply appreciated support every step of the way. Richard started me on the path of Buddhist studies through a semester of study at Oxford while an undergraduate, and has supported me with his friendship and generosity as a mentor my entire life since. His ability to combine critical thinking with concern for others and a very warm heart embody the Buddha's teachings.

The following individuals helped me with the design and testing of the questionnaires for the study: Jennifer Barlow, Laura Benedict, Stephen Brown, the Rev. Catherine Cullen, Jim Kershner, Grady McGonagill, Bob Morrison, Jerry Murphy, Mike Nakkula, Todd Nugent, Bob & Geraldine Perry, and Hugh Silbaugh. Ethan Beal-Brown, Claire Bennet, and Edward Hamlin helped with the website design, and Claire Bennet created the artwork for the website banner.

The following individuals and their respective organizations provided essential and deeply appreciated networking assistance for recruitment for the study:

- Jon Kabat-Zinn, Saki Santorelli, and Larry Horowitz of the Center for Mindfulness;
- Ken Wilber, Clint Fuhs, Katie Heikkinen, and Robb Smith of the Integral Institute;
- Clyde Crosswell of the George Washington University Executive Leadership Program;
- Marie Peeler, and the Georgetown University Executive Coaching Program alumni;
- Jennifer Barlow & Wendy Cook of the Kurukulla Center for Tibetan Buddhist Studies;
- Maddy Klyne of the Cambridge Insight Meditation Center;
- Mirabai Bush & Arthur Zajonc of the Center for Contemplative Mind in Society;
- Lyn Hartley and the Fielding University Human & Organizational Development Dept.;
- Thomas Crisman of the Vipassana Meditation Course for Business Executives in the tradition of S.N. Goenka;
- Bill Joiner, ChangeWise;
- Gretchen Krampf, ProcessExperts;
- Marc Margoulis of the Institute for Jewish Spirituality;
- The Academy of Management EMONET and MSR listservs.

Further networking assistance was provided by: David Belden, John Bell, Laura Benedict, Helen Cherillo, Susann Cook-Greuter, the Rev. Catherine Cullen, Kate Davis, Edward Hamlin, Arthur Jue, Joanne Mathews, Grady McGonagill, Doug Miller, Kris Miller, James Richie-Dunham, Lila Wheeler, and Shinzen Young. My sincere apologies to anyone who I have missed, and a deep gassho to each of you.

During the writing of this dissertation I held an American Fellowship from the American Association of University Women which provided crucial financial support.

Although I cannot thank them by name, I am tremendously grateful to all of the 188 people who participated in the Mindful Leadership Study. Thank you for your patience and your generosity with your time, life experiences, and your fascinating insights, as well as the personal words of encouragement and support so many of you sent to me. I simply cannot thank you enough, and hope that together we may help others reach their fullest potential, and enhance humanity's ability to cooperate.

A cadre of friends and colleagues provided love and support for many years. Bob & Geraldine Perry provided sumptuous food, love, and a cozy place to sleep, as well as all of the tangible and intangible support anyone could ever hope to receive. Jennifer Barlow and Liliana Garces made me laugh and helped me reset my compass whenever rough conditions threatened to obscure the way. Susann Cook-Greuter, Kris Miller, and Jeff Stewart helped me through some of the toughest points. Our home base at Manomet Center for Conservation Sciences was rock solid thanks to Linda Leddy, Linda Damon, Meredith Gutowski, and many interns who helped us and our family (including kitties). My mother, Lois Blumberg, and mother-in-law, Rae Brown, were steadfast in their love and faith. My stepchildren, Claire Bennet and Ethan Beal-Brown, reminded me to have fun, and forgave me when I was overly stressed.

Last, I want to again thank my husband, Stephen Brown, who sacrificed so much to make this happen, and who helped me every step of the way. Working on his studies of shorebirds in the wilderness of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska, and on the coastal islands of Georgia, renewed, sustained, and nurtured me. He is in many ways the most emotionally intelligent person I have ever known, and the clearest thinking as well. From him I have learned how to love, how to be in relationship, and how to smooth some of my rough edges. He is not my better half, he is my better three-quarters.
